VENDETTA BEGUN

Two Italians Fatally Wounded in a Battle in the Street.

Friends of Sesca and Ancila Engage in Deadly Warfare.

De Prisco Dead and Carmino Sescu

At 340 North Second street is Annie Decker, thirteen years old, who was shot through both legs. She will recover, although she may be a cripple for life.

There was a dead caim over the Italian end of Williamsburg—there always is a calm before a battle, although it is sometimes called an ominous calm—the women had taken the week's wash off the four-story lines, and the barber in the basement shop was hurriedly shaving his last customer so he could put his shutters up and get behind the stoye.

Major-General Committees of the could be stoye.

who didn't run away were Besca, who was held in the hallway by the builet in his back; Louis de Prisco, of 188 Union avenue, whose stomach had stopped a similar piece of lead, and Annie Decker, a thirteen-year-old girl, of 360 North Becond street, both of whose legs were perforated by the same builet.

The police came in at this point, and the wounded men were taken to the hospital. Then those who were in the neighborhood began picking the builets out of the houses.

They fought with rifes, knives and bricks, with paying stones and shinny sticks, Each Dasp put in his best licks.

Carmino Sesca, thirty-eight years old, is also at the hospital, and it is a question whether ne will live through both legs. She will be was shot through both legs. An Injunction Against Pirates Oyster Bay.

The dispute between the Matinnecock Oyster Company and the Sound oystermen of City island and other places along the Sound, was aired in the Queens County Court, to-day, before Judge Barnard, when William J. Youngs, snaving his last customer so he could put his shutters up and get behind the stove.

Major-General Carmino Sesca, whose home was at 188 Union avenue, had insulted the wife and daughter of Brig.

Gen. Glovanni Ancila, and the buyers and sellers of rags and bones were gnawing viciously upon one solitary bone—the one called discontent.

Besca had done more. He had pasted large posters on the fences and on the barrels, telling those who cared to read that Ancila had the grains of a chicken, and his wife and daughter were not what they ought to be. That is why the forces of battle lined up, and the chest of every man was padded with cloth enough to stop the builet from a how-lizer.

Besca retreating temporarily to his home to smoke and meditate, sat with his back to the window. Ancila, with a rifle half full of buillets, ambushed himself behind a lamppost and sent a piece of lead the size of a peanut into the unsuspecting smoker.

The leader of the sharpshooters sumped into the air as he felt the sting of the buillet, grabbed a revolver, and can downstairs to lead his men on to battle.

of the bullet, grabbed a revolver, and ran downstairs to lead his men on to battle.

He reached the foot of the steps, when he fell, and fifty-one-year-old Gaeton flavine, who was close by his side, picked up the revolver and led the men out to the street.

The musketeers on the opposite side fired a volley, and then the shooting became general.

When there were no bullets left in the guns, and when all the bricks in the neighborhood had followed the bullets, both armies escaped. Among those
